Environmental, social and governance (ESG) issues have been front of mind through the course of the pandemic. As standards setters converge and governments around the globe take steps to strengthen, and, in some cases, mandate disclosure and more sustainable practices it's a clear signal that we cannot afford to revert to business as usual.

Beyond climate, corporates and investors are under increasing pressure to consider the full spectrum of ESG issues. Additionally, the evolving consensus on corporate purpose highlights that the ‘S’ of ESG is not just an ethical and moral consideration, but a financial and business imperative.

The annual Responsible Business conference, hosted in a hybrid format, will convene global leaders, C-suite executives, sustainability professionals, and policymakers in London at Chatham House on 3 March 2022.

Session 1
The future of corporate leadership

Exploring the core considerations influencing corporate leadership and governance structures and the emerging risks and opportunities for decision-makers.

Session 2
ESG and sustainable finance

Examining the role of regulators, corporates and the finance sector in aligning the financial system with projects and companies that embed social and environmental commitments into their business models and activities.

Session 3
Data and disclosure

Assessing the pathways to more rigorous ESG disclosure and measurement with a focus on the standardization of standard setters, framework providers and metrics.

Session 4
The ‘S’ of ESG

Examining how human rights interests, combating modern slavery and supporting civil society are weighed on corporate, investment and policy agendas and the risks and opportunities in delivering sustainable impact.
